COYOTE

in a cat suit

Which for me is six pounds over.

But! Body fat percentage of twenty percent, baby. I tested out with flying colors.

I'm not surprised.

I've seen your guns.

Bah. Let's go get a milkshake.

I bet the Cowboy has to test out, too. And Dad has been positively bitchy all week.

Dad on low blood sugar? Sooooo not fun to be around.

I wouldn't think Dad would have a problem. He's got that wardrobe he doesn't want to grow out of. g

It doesn't look cheap.

People who pack muscle on easily always have this problem. I've known more than one person in the military who had that issue, and I suspect there are very few firefighters who do not--and when my landlady's daughter was working as an EMT, she did--at 5'3"!

Several years ago I read an article suggesting that most of the top female tennis players grossly underreported their weights for public consumption--because what sounds like a fashionable weight and what's an effective working weight are two different things. I say Screw that whole "six pounds over"--weight/BMI is most of teh ways we use it.

The government decides what we get to weigh if they're going to continue to employ us. I'm always ounces from being under; she's always over.

She can test out, though.

I have to eat a huge breakfast.

I am, yes, eight inches taller.

I got that, the gummint decides, just as for my old acquaintances in the army. It's just that weight/height alone is such a crappy measure. It took a while for the army to get firmly behind checking body fat percentages--I knew one guy who was 6'6", with biceps greater in diameter than my thighs and abs worthy of a soft-core porn fashion shoot, who was threatened with the fat-boy program. He probably had some fat in the palms of his hands and the soles of his feet and in his earlobes...

The good news is, Uncle Sam gives us better weight ranges than the army gets.

The bad news is, they give us a hellu more stringent test-out.
